

Aims and objectives

After the classical anthropological studies on rites de passage, transitions in the life course have been constantly on the research agenda since the 1980s. Flexibilisation of work, limitations of welfare states, changes of family structures and gender roles as well as longer life have contributed to a de-standardisation of the institutionalised life course. In consequence, transitions between life stages have become more uncertain and risky. For a long time, primarily transitions between youth and adulthood have been addressed. Increasingly, however, transitions from early childhood to very old age and with regard to diverse situations, institutions and spheres of life are in the focus.

Transition research has developed and diversified across different disciplines, epistemological interests and approaches as well as research methodologies. These developments have resulted in a research scenery which is difficult to be overlooked while there seems to be a theoretical deficit. Research seems to operate with different understandings of transitions which are rarely made explicit. In fact, the meaning of transitions seems to be so self-evident that theoretical clarification appears to be dispensable.

The aim of this conference is taking stock of concepts and controversies, findings and insights, perspectives and paradigms of transition research across the life course in the last three decades and to find common ground for theorising transitions. Key notes reflect on and present experiences from life course research, biographical analysis, developmental studies and from different disciplines, especially sociology, psychology and educational science. Cross-cutting to these overarching perspectives, recent research agendas on transitions in the distinct life stages childhood, youth, adulthood and old age will be reviewed and discussed.

The conference is part of the programme of the Research Training Group „Doing Transitions“ funded by the Deutsche Forschungsgemeinschaft (DFG; see www.doingtransitions.org). It focusses on the question how transitions in the life course emerge from social practices of formation and production on the levels of discourse, institutions and individuals. With this international conference, „Doing Transitions“ goes public. It invites researchers from different disciplines and gives young researchers the opportunity to build networks in the field.
